Susannah Buckles first got involved with JCV in September 2018. She resides near Charles Town at Gap View Farm, which has been in her family for more than 70 years. Gap View Farm, a 330 acre cattle farm, is located downstream and downwind from the Rockwool plant.

Susannah first became aware of the fragility of the karst topography that is native to Jefferson County in the late 1980s, when a plan to put in a quarry near Kearneysville was rejected after much evidence and protest by the citizens.

She learned about the planned Rockwool plant in September 2018, after the Jefferson County Commission had approved the placement of her farm under the West Virginia Farmland Protection Program. The goal of the program is to preserve farmland, and to that end requires that the property can only be used as a farm, in perpetuity.

Susannah has been an invaluable supporter of JCV and has dedicated time to attending protests, speaking at meetings, writing letters, making signs, and helping with fundraisers. When she first started attending protests, at the Danish Embassy in DC and here in Jefferson County, she joined people from all walks of life and was gratified to see such a diverse group of people come together to protect their community. Early on, Susannah attended many local public meetings and was dismayed at how so many raised concerns went unaddressed. Susannah has been dedicated to using all natural, non-toxic products and practices on her farm, and its close proximity to Rockwool has brought up many concerns. Throughout this process, Susannah has learned to take things one day at a time. Her primary goal now is to ensure the best possible direction for her farm.

Susannah's commitment to her farm and her belief that the welfare of people needs to be placed above profits has motivated her to stay involved in the fight against Rockwool and other heavy industry. She hopes that JCV will help us achieve a clean, healthy environment for the people who live here.
